

At the end of the lesson, the student will be able to:

* discuss the importance of speaking the English language in getting a good job.

Read the dialogue

Irma: Hello. This is Irma.

Matt: Hi Irma. How was the interview?

Irma: Well, he hired me.

Matt: You were hired for the management job? That's great! I told you.

Irma: No, I didn't say I got the management job. He hired me for a job in customer service, selling tours to Asia.

Matt: Just the customer service? But what about the management job? You were qualified for that management position.

Irma: I know, I indicated it in my resume. I worked in Travel Management for five years and that I even have a course in Business Management here in the U.S.

Matt: Oh, I can't believe that. You're perfectly qualified for that management position.

Irma: It's useless. It's not fair. I even got a degree here in the U.S.

Matt: Wait a minute. Why weren't you hired for the management position?

Irma: He said that the problem is my English.

Matt: But your English is fantastic!

Irma: But I'm not a native speaker, I guess that's the problem.

Matt: Well, you know, you spend a little time at the customer service and you can work your way up for the management position.

- 1. What qualifications does Irma have?
- 2. Why didn't she get the job she wanted?
- 3. What is she going to do next?
- 4. What do you think Irma should do?
- 5. Are there any jobs that can only be done by native speakers of English? What jobs? Why?

Activity

*Agree or Disagree to the following ideas:

- 1. British English should be taught as the standard.
- 2. American English should be taught as the standard.
- 3. Countries (schools) should choose which will they teach as the standard.
- 4. Each country uses its own version of English as its own standard.